Website 1 — Anand Wellness

Original screenshots: pages 1–6

This website presents a wellness and yoga service with a calm, nature-inspired visual style. The light background, muted green accents, and wide photography create a peaceful first impression that suits a wellness brand.

The opening page introduces the wellness offering and uses prominent imagery to invite visitors to explore. The instructor section adds a human element by presenting the people behind the service. A later section highlights yoga poses or practice options, helping visitors understand the kinds of sessions or content available.

The final screenshot acts as a hero or welcome section, using a short wellbeing-focused message and a call-to-action. Together, the pages follow a simple visitor journey: understand the brand, meet instructors, explore practices, and take the next step.

Main elements visible in the screenshots

• Navigation links at the top of the pages and a prominent action button.

• Welcome/introductory section supported by yoga and wellness photography.

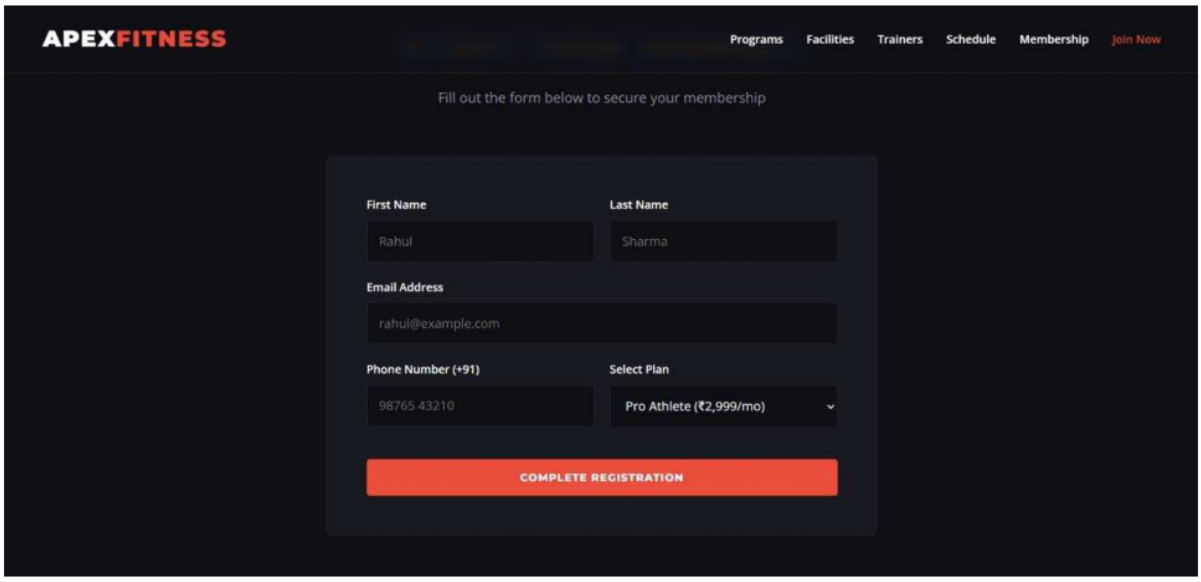

• Instructor profiles that help build trust and familiarity.

• Yoga pose or practice cards presented in a consistent grid.

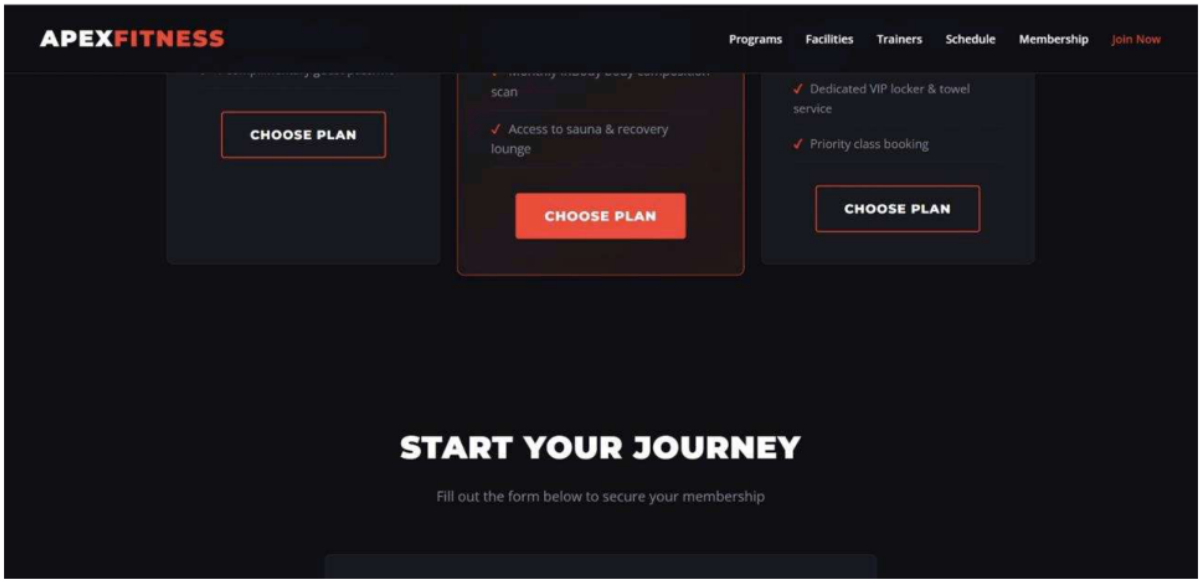

• A hero banner with a clear wellness message and call-to-action.

Website 2 — Apex Fitness

Original screenshots: pages 7–16

This website is a fitness-club or gym concept with a dark, high-contrast design. Black backgrounds, bright orange accents, and bold headings give it an energetic, performance-focused appearance.

The screenshots show a sign-up or membership-entry area, membership plan cards with prices, a class schedule, trainer profiles, facility photography, workout-program descriptions, and a main promotional hero. These sections cover the main questions a prospective gym member may have: how to join, what membership costs, when classes run, who the trainers are, and what facilities or programs are available.

The layout uses repeated cards and strong calls-to-action to make the site easy to scan. For a real implementation, the most important usability priorities would be keeping plan prices and inclusions clear, making the schedule readable on mobile, and ensuring sign-up buttons lead directly to a working registration or contact flow.

Main elements visible in the screenshots

• Membership or registration form.

• Membership pricing cards with a highlighted plan.

• Class timetable / schedule.

• Trainer profiles with photographs.

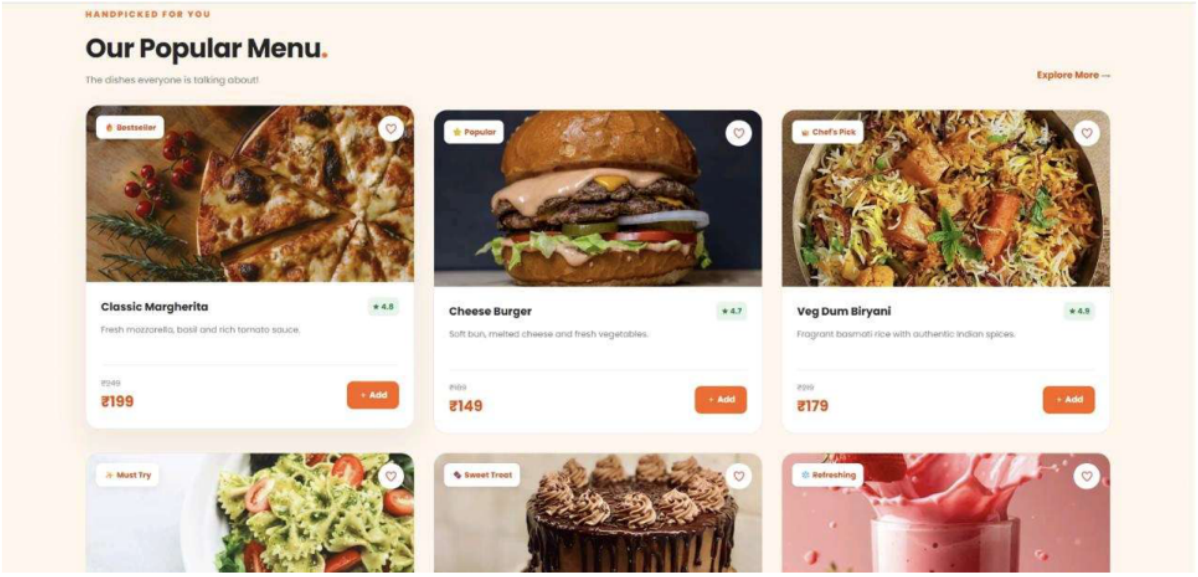

• Facilities section using gym imagery.

• Workout-program cards describing different training focuses.

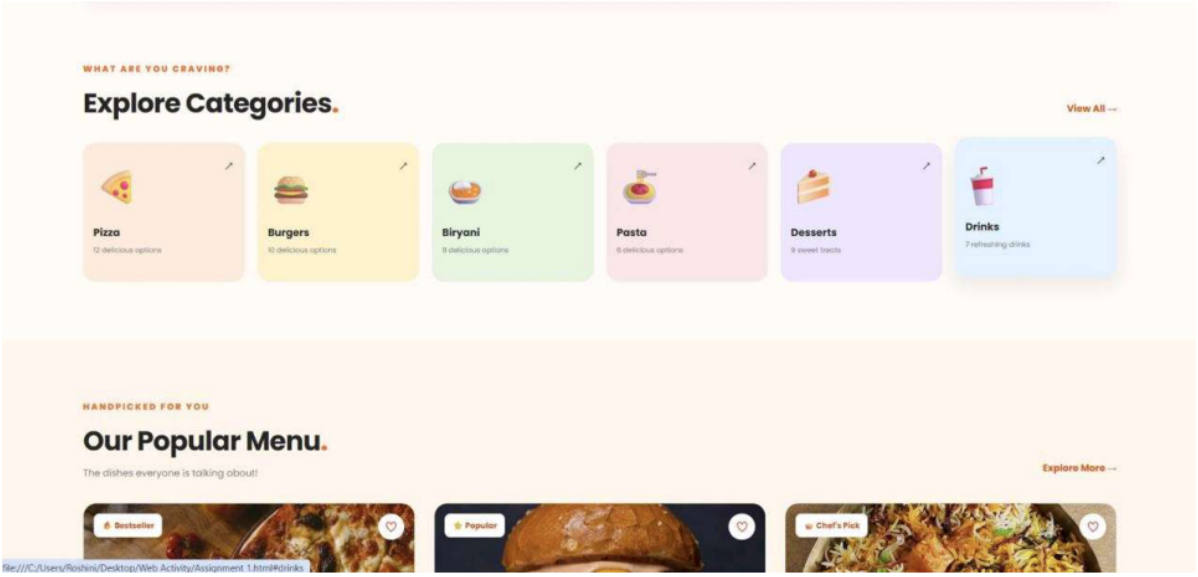

• Large hero banner with a primary call-to-action.

Website 3 — Food Ordering / Restaurant Website

Original screenshots: pages 17–19

This website appears to be a food-ordering or restaurant brand. It uses a warm cream background, orange accents, food photography, and dark promotional panels to make dishes stand out and encourage ordering.

The screenshots show a menu-led experience: popular dishes are presented as image cards with short labels and order buttons, followed by category tiles and a promotional banner. The final page uses a dark hero area with a featured food image and a direct action button, while the lighter sections below support browsing.

The visual hierarchy is designed to help customers move quickly from discovering a dish to choosing an item. In a finished site, each menu card should ideally include the dish name, price, useful dietary or ingredient information, and a clear add-to-cart or order action.

Main elements visible in the screenshots

• Popular-menu cards with food images and order buttons.

• Category tiles for browsing different types of food.

• Promotional banners to draw attention to offers or featured items.

• A hero section featuring a main product and ordering call-to-action.

• Consistent warm colors and large food photography to support appetite appeal.
